It can seem like the massive eves dropping started after 9. November 2001, when the terrorist bombed worlds trading centre. More and more technology is being made for recording what people do. It does not matter what age you are or if you committed the crime or not.

The government have asked several firm to collect data from users and send it to the government. They also have developed technology that matches everybody faces with their criminal record. Some people they have arrested before the crime were committed, as they posted some tweets or sent some messages that contained wrong words

According to GDPR the company needs to document or prove that consent has occurred between the user and the company and document that the users have accepted the terms of use, and if the consent is withdrawn, it should have an immediate effect. In real life you have agreed to their conditions and privacy policy as soon as you start to use the websites.

There is nobody that actually has time to read the terms and conditions. According to Signs and conditions may apply you have to spent 180 hours each month in order to read every website, application, program and so on you use. Assume you where to read everything then you had to spend seven to eight days with just reading terms and conditions. That is time you could spend to read a book, work, hang out with friends or just relax.

As it takes a huge amount of time most people just look through the conditions and terms until he see the accept button, they then just click the accept button as they else will not be able to use the program. Companies can never be sure if they users have read through the terms. You have to ask yourself if the terms and conditions are viable. Personally, I do not think so as there is nobody that reads the contract.

There has to be easier ways of making the document of signs and conditions. However, business owners benefit from making the terms and conditions unreadable. According to wall street journal consumers lose 250 million dollars for what is hidden in the little text. These moneys the companies gain, as they for example can sell user information without compensation. Often it is also so that the more information the users lack, the more money the companies gains.

Reality actually show us that the less users pay to use the program the more is sold of the user's soul. Several companies have found out that using a picture of from the user for advertising is worth more than a thousand angry words.

Assume that the default was set to sharing with everybody then people would get used to that. If you change the default into sharing with less people, people would find it harder to share it with other people. If you see it the other way around. When the sharing settings is set from private to public people would share more than they actually want, as they get comfortable with it. Short said you get comfortable with what the default is set to. When the default change people will get problems with that.
